THE RIVER WANDLE: PAST AND PRESENT*

ត់ទីNTEREST in the river which has gradually carved out the valley in which we live should be a perfectly natural emotion. As Charles Kingsley long ago pointed out, of all the physical agencies which have made our country what it is, and which are still continually modifying and gradually changing it, none, as a general rule, is more potent than water. Moreover, when we come to consider it, we shall find that no other of the various geographical features of which it may consist has more induced the first human settlement in any tract of country than the flow of a river or stream through or near it, and, accordingly, as that river or stream may be adapted to the purposes of man, whether for navigation, for mill power, or for whatsoever use to which it may be put, so has the development of the first early settlements in its valley proceeded,
